

Preface This book addresses the topic of the Best Place to Live Survey as one of a series of studies to examine the factors associated with relative satisfaction with one's community. The purpose of the study is to explore the characteristics of New Mexico communities that make them good places for family and children to live. The authors are primarily concerned with the economic factors relating to the local environment, including unemployment, health, and crime. The study attempts to validate previous studies and introduce a social science perspective on the study of communities. Although the study is not the largest ever conducted in the United States on the topic, it has, to our knowledge, the first comprehensive sampling of all counties in the state. The current study began in June 2011. The study is continuing, but by the time this work is in print, the authors expect the economic effects on relative happiness of counties will be clearer and more consistent with existing research. The study of communities begins with a review of the research on the determinants of happiness. Happiness has been defined as a combination of a sense of well-being, positive affect, and eudaimonic. Life satisfaction is one index of happiness because it incorporates happiness and well-being, which can be defined as the way people evaluate their lives. Eudaimonics is a popular concept in happiness studies.
