Bare-Faced Truth I was reminded of a poster that appeared at a local hospital 10 or so years ago. It read "I'm not very sick, do you want to take me home?". I posted on another thread about this a while back and was reminded of this with the recent "AIG" fiasco. I recall several years ago I worked at a bank while attending graduate school, and did some volunteer work for a hospital. At the hospital they had a board over the water cooler that said something like "Patient's last name: _____ H.M.O. # : _____". I thought that was funny. My firm was hired by the hospital to handle the claims from a bad construction project. And all the claims are related to construction flaws. The hospital board over the water cooler had been changed. The newly changed board said "Patient's last name: _____ H.M.O. #: _____." It was one of those times when the boss and I were laughing so hard we had tears in our eyes. And that was on a Monday. Make matters worse, the existing measures, including those proposed by the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety (CCOHS), wouldn't fix the problem in the first place. The problem is that the current measures are based on the 2010 edicts set out by the province's Ministry of Labour. In this case, the ministry's edict was based on EU directives concerning equipment to be used on oil and gas platforms. It has been a little more than two years since that edict was put in place. "New rules are needed," states the ministry's edict. "For example," states the edict, "the focus should be on designs that will be used for 25 years and then replaced. The focus should not be on the latest, most expensive designs." Considering that, rather than putting the onus for implementing any new regulations on the industry, the Ontario government should set up a committee that is composed of both safety experts and engineers and use their advice to devise the new standards, I would think that the ministry's edict is, at best, premature. With job cuts looming at top two B.C. oil companies, labour relations at Enbridge Inc. could come under strain. Enbridge is facing some big challenges in 2014 as it prepares for a major expansion of its export pipelines from Alberta into the West Coast market. With its Westcoast Energy unit, the British Columbia-based energy firm is planning to increase capacity on its mainline pipeline to increase delivery of oil from the oilsands to the West Coast market. Enbridge's primary pipeline, which runs from Edmonton to Superior, Wis., is already at capacity and can't keep up with rising demand. The Calgary-based oil and gas company needs at least $3.9-billion more in capacity on its main network in 2014 and up to an estimated $7.5-billion to get it all built by 2020. As the Enbridge Inc. board prepares to meet this week to discuss the company's 2015 budget, the labour strife that has enveloped the energy giant are in the back of some board members' minds. Despite a shortage of skilled labour in the industry, job cuts and early retirement plans are eroding the company's workforce. Labour relations at Enbridge Inc., the parent company of Westcoast Energy, are on the back burner. Enbridge is dealing with a shortfall in skilled people, which translates into job
