Meteorologists have warned of conditions that could cause "numerous transport-related incidents". The highest winds are expected in Cornwall, but the strongest gusts can reach 80mph in the south-west of England. In the north-east there will be heavy showers, with an amber alert for heavy rain and further risk of surface flooding. The red warning - for severe travel disruption - remains in place for much of England and Wales until Wednesday evening, while the yellow weather warning for surface flooding will last until Thursday morning. The storms are associated with an area of low pressure situated over the Atlantic Ocean, which is known as Storm Conor and will strengthen over the next 24 hours. Gusts of almost 100mph were recorded at the Met Office radar station at Morwenstow in Cornwall early on Monday. Storm Doris brought more storms to Wales on Monday and heavy snow to parts of north-west England. Heavy rain bands swept through south Wales, where some roads were closed and routes were hampered by fallen trees and debris. Cornwall airport reported strong gusts of up to 73mph, with rainfall of between 12-18mm.
