She was on a respirator and in the intensive care unit (ICU) at the hospital. After a few weeks, she was released, but the cough persisted and she was forced to take a couple of months off work. Dr. Sarukkai found herself in a tough spot. As a double board certified pulmonologist/critical care specialist, she struggled with insurance. In 2017, her insurance company cancelled her policy with them, leaving her with no coverage and facing a major financial hardship. Prairie Valley Hospital was there for her. With compassion and care, they helped her coordinate her care with her family physician to get her back on track. In three visits to the hospital,

Supreme Court gave the green light on Thursday to a referendum that could allow President Donald Trump to make good on a pledge to tear up the Paris climate accord. The court refused to let the case against the president's effort to use an executive order to pull out of the 2015 accord proceed to a federal appeals court. The justices let a lower-court ruling stand that rejected Trump's claim that he had the power to withdraw from the nonbinding climate accord because he is an "emperor," not a dictator. The legal reasoning from the justices, at least publicly, was murky. The case was resolved in Trump's favor in the court's conservative majority, although Chief Justice John

Roberts and Justice Brett Kavanaugh joined the liberal justices in a separate opinion that underscores the political and policy divisions on climate change within the court and the country. Roberts and Kavanaugh suggested that the president could pull out of the Paris accord on his own, without congressional approval, as former President Barack Obama did. For the conservative justices, this was their way of not wading into a hot-button political issue. For the four liberal justices, it was a way to oppose Trump on climate change. All of this makes for a mixed and confusing message. In reality, the case is about power — the power to amend or repeal laws and regulations through an executive order. It's about whether Trump's power to make changes via executive order is so broad that he can change the rules about what he can and cannot do on his own. In a classic example of separation of powers, the Supreme Court allowed presidents to have power to protect national security, to act within their constitutional powers as military commander in chief and to conduct foreign policy. The justices didn't go much further in its ruling, but they suggested that Congress had to be involved in any changes to regulations aimed at addressing global warming. The court said the president has to have a "statutory basis" for a deal with other nations. "The executive could not waive a provision of the statute

A: The huawei Hisilicon firmware writer cracked 188 has been officially released. Link: Q: Global function call from ES6 code I have an ES6 class in a file foo.js which is imported into another file: `import { foo } from './foo.js'`; Then in foo.js we have some code that looks something like this: `class Bar { static doSomething() { // do something } static doOtherThing() { // do other thing } // more code } export default Bar`; Then when I import bar I would want to be able to just do `bar.doSomething()`; as opposed to having to do `bar.Bar.doSomething()`; How do I do this? A: You're probably looking for a static method on Bar. `class Bar { static doSomething() { // do something } static doOtherThing() { // do other thing } // more code } export default Bar; Bar.doSomething(); // this Bar.doOtherThing(); // and this Bar.doSomething(); Bar.doOtherThing();` Also, just one note, while you don't technically need a class here, it does add a bit of structure and separation from the underlying implementation of Bar. So, unless you've already decided to use a class for something, you may consider it. A: In your instance it should just work. Just do `bar.doSomething()`; and `bar.doOtherThing()`; A: Take a look at They are accessed using: `Bar.doSomething()`; What will happen is that `Bar.doSomething`
